By Catherine Mc Auliffe and Joanne lai

History of Keeping Memories

- The history of keeping memories dates back so long (around 35,400 years ago) even in cave drawings and on surfaces of rocks

Joanne's Memories

- This clock was given to Joanne from her mother. Her grandmother had it for a few years and gave it to her daughter to keep. Now she has passed it on to her own daughter to keep.

Christening Shawl

- This christening shawl was crocheted by a 100 year old lady related to Catherine who has since died. This is a christening shawl that was made specially for Catherine's baby and it was used in Catherine's daughters christening.

First moments

This is a collection of Catherine's baby's first pair of shoes, first tooth, first curl and the baby's footprint and handprint at 6 months old.

The background features a series of concentric, overlapping circles in light gray, some solid and some dashed, creating a ripple effect. A prominent red callout box is centered on the page, containing the title text. The box has a rectangular top and a pointed bottom, resembling a speech bubble or a callout.

How Memories are Kept in Ireland.

- In Ireland people keep memories alive through folklore and by passing stories down from generation to generation.
- Many photos are taken and preserved from the past as well.
- Most of the folklore passed down in Ireland is about Irish history and there is one Irish scary story about the legend of Banshee.
